Synopsis of Chapters Already Published

Eben Nash, a young electrician, sails from New York on the Winnewaba, and has three room mates, two of whom he overhears in conversation that arouses his suspicions that they mean some harm to him. One of these men is an Englishman, Hicke by name, and the other is Picketzo, an Italian. Mr. Bonner is the third man, and he and Nash become friends at once. The Englishman, Hicke, turns suspicion to Nash unwarrantably in a poker game on the first day out. The captain of the steamer accuses Nash of being a card sharp, and denies him the right to use the smoking room during the voyage. Marjory Bonner assures Nash that both she and her father believe him innocent.

Ing a valuable watch from the capitals stable.

The missing watch is found in Nash's trunk, and he is placed in irons.

Nash is taken sick and released from confinement. Hicke and Picketzo threaten to throw him overboard.

Picketzo rifles Nash's trunk and takes from it some electrical apparatus. A heavy fog settles down on the ocean.

Passengers on the steamer fear they have been lost in the fog, and all hands are ordered to be in readiness to leave the vessel at a moment's notice in case of collision.

The captain announces at Sunday serve that the needle in the ship's compass ad become erratic, and that, with the osence of the sun and stars, due to the vareloping fog, sailing is dangerous. He knowledged that the ship was lost in the form.

"Good! If you can only do that we can get some the curious countenances of three or four ship's officers gathered around."

The work went on as standy a sible, so that the passengers would know nothing about it. If the thing did not work, it would be hardly right to have raised their expectations only to dash them.
